

Recruitment video: Rob

My name is Rob, and I've been painting for a little over a decade.

When I became a painter, I started earning money right away. My painting business over the last five years has grown exponentially, and it continues to grow month after month. I haven't had to market or advertise anything. I'm booked out for three months already, and the phone calls continue to come in.

To start and become a painter, it doesn't take a lot of money at all. You need a roller and a brush and a ladder. And as you continue to work and make money you can get more ladders, more rollers, more sprayers, say. More tools for the trade.

I couldn't work in an office. I need a change of scenery like you get with being a painter. Every couple days, every week, you know, you're going to a new worksite. It's never dull. You have a new area to work on, a new palette, per se, every time you go to work.

I'm a single dad, so for me, it's very easy to schedule around that life. If my daughter has stuff for school, every Wednesday I can be done with work early so I can take her to gymnastics. I can take off lunch and go to her school recitals. I can take off any day I need to for her, if need be. If she's sick, I can stay home. It feels amazing to be able to be there for my daughter.

I love where my painting business is going, and the growth that it is showing. We definitely need more painters out there to help, we need a younger workforce to come and learn and help. There's more than enough work out there for all of us.
